Chemicals prevent unwanted fruit

Every year, the question comes up on how do we keep trees, such as crabapples and other fruiting trees, from bearing unwanted fruit that can be messy and hazardous. Crabapples are the easiest to control by applying the common insecticide Sevin (carbaryl) soon after the blossoms have dried on the trees. Do not apply Sevin during blooming because it kills bees. Spray trees thoroughly with two tablespoons of Sevin per gallon of water. Check the label on the Sevin to make sure this use is present. Stems on the fruit should turn yellow and wrinkle, and the tiny apples should start to drop in seven to 10 days. If they haven't started dropping in two weeks, a second application may be needed. Sevin remains effective for about 35 days after full bloom, but the fruit will become more difficult to remove as it increases in size. Florel is sold in many stores as a fruit eliminator. The active ingredient is ethephon, a chemical that releases ethylene, which causes fruit to drop before it sets. According to the label, a foliar application of Florel will reduce or eliminate undesirable fruit development on many ornamental trees and shrubs such as apple, cottonwood, crabapple, elm, flowering pear, horse chestnut, maple, oak, pine, sweetgum and sycamore. But how well it works and potential damaging effects depend on the dose and temperature. Activity slows if the temperature is below 60 or above 90 degrees.

Because Florel degrades quickly in water, applications should be completed within four hours of mixing. Timing of the application must coincide with full bloom, a stage that requires close observation with many of our trees. Researchers at Kansas State University's John C. Pair Research Center near Wichita have gotten mixed results using Florel on treated crabapples. With some varieties, fruit was substantially thinned. Others showed no effect. We cannot make firm recommendations on the use of this product without research results on other tree species.
