

Art Still, a former Kansas City Chiefs player, checked out a large collection of DreamWorks DVDs set up for the Slice of Life benefit silent auction Saturday.

Slice of Life: Celebrities, locals party for charity

SLICE, from Page 1

with Tim Kempton, former Phoenix Suns player, for $2,500, and Larry Brunson, Denver Broncos player, for $2,300.

The night included some light entertainment, with music from the Steve Aumiller Band and a basketball display by Gator Rivers, a former Harlem Globetrotters player.

“That’s amazing,” muttered the crowd as they watched Rivers spin the basketball around his body, maintaining perfect control.

Guests helped themselves to a table loaded with shrimp, salads, meatballs, fresh veggies and more. Water and coffee were provided and the bar was open for drinks.

When the auction was over, McCants thanked everyone for attending, mentioning that all proceeds for the event will go to help finance rural health care.

Gator Rivers, a former Harlem Globetrotters star, spun a basketball on his finger and then handed it off to Charlie, a young fan. Rivers and other basketball players signed autographs and gave a basketball demonstration for kids at the Goodland Activities Center on Saturday.

Jeanie Schields danced the night away with Scott McPhail from Dreamworks at the Slice of Life benefit auction Saturday.

Walter White, a former Kansas City Chiefs player, entertained the crowd with a velvet voice while Leroy Mitchell, former Chiefs player, danced along.