A study published in the July 13 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association indicates that simple communication efforts can improve the quality of end-of-life care and increase the use of hospice in nursing homes.

A controlled study with people selected randomly found that communication based on the needs of the particular case increased referrals to hospice and also improved the families' satisfaction with the care their loved ones received at the end of life.

The study also showed that sharing hospice information earlier may also decrease the use of acute care
