Both corn and sorghum keep their growing point below the ground or in the center of the stalk, where it is protected, for much of the season. If hail occurs at this time and the growing point remains unharmed, yield will be cut but the Hail also can bruise the stalk, allowing easy entry for disease and insects. This can cause yield loss on

If hail damage occurs when the grain sorghum head is exerted or the corn ears and tassels are out, then a considerable amount of yield potential will be lost. Unlike soybeans, which can branch out if one part gets broken off, corn and grain sorghum only have one growing point per stalk. Once the reproductive part of these plants has been broken off, there will not be another to replace it. Late-season tillering on grain sorghum may make up for some loss if the later-maturing

Crops can be saved after hail

With the recent severe weather, there are small areas where intense hail storms have occurred.

Hail can shred the leaves off corn and sorghum, making them look like sticks in the ground. With this damage, the first thought that jumps into mind is the crop is lost. However, this is not typically true.

To evaluate hail damage, corn at the 15-leaf growth stage had 80 percent of its leaf area removed. At harvest, this 80 percent defoliated corn saw a yield reduction of 36 to 38.5 percent, compared to nondefoliated corn. A sizeable percentage of the potential yield was harvested by allowing the corn to continue to grow.

'Power, Part II'

By Pastor Glenn A. Krebs, United Methodist churches of Dresden and Jennings

We are talking about power and some popular extent. But as our society began to realize that there beliefs about what gives us power.

When I was growing up in the '50s, there was a common saying: "Money is power."

The belief was if a person had enough money, they would also have power. In a sense, that is true: bribery has always been a way of gaining power, and money is the most popular form of bribery. It seems that every year some college is accused of bribing the most outstanding athletes to enroll by offering money or other goods (which are purchased with money).

Having enough money enables a person to buy, for example, an expensive and impressive car. That alone can give a form of power. If another powerful person is impressed by that car, all kinds of clusive events, dates with attractive members of the correct). opposite gender.

are wealthy people who have little power, while others with less wealth seem to have power, a new saying entered our common thinking: "Knowledge is power."

The idea behind this is that education and/or technical training can empower a person. If you know something that I don't know, you have a form of power over me. If two people, one with a good education and one without, apply for the same job, the educated applicant is usually chosen. Knowledge of construction techniques, electrical wiring and plumbing can give a person power over the condition of his or her home. Knowledge of individual rights can save us from many forms of oppression and dishonesty.

My own dear mother always advised me that a good ducation is the starting point for anything at whic things could happen: job offers, invitations to experson wants to be successful in life (she was, and is,

Next week we'll take a look at yet another piece of "Money is power" will always be true to some current wisdom.
