What tillage system is the best?

With farmers debating the question of which tillage system is best in northwest Kansas, Jim Shroyer, a K-State specialist, provides some light on the subject by analyzing the results from a 10-year wheat-sorghum-fallow rotation study.

The study was done at the Southwest Research-Extension Center at Tribune from 1991 to 2000. Three tillage treatments were used within the rotation: conventional tillage, in which four to five tillage operations were used for weed control during the fallow period; reduced tillage, which used two to three tillage operations and one or two herbicide applications to control weeds during the fallow period; and no-till, which used only herbicides.

The 10-year average wheat yield was greatest for no-till (46 bushels per acre), while wheat in the reduced tillage system yielded 43 bushels per acre, and the conventional tillage yielded only 38 bushels per acre. That represents a 17 percent yield advantage for no-till wheat over conventional tillage same trend. The 10-year no-till sor- now than during the study period ghum yielded 76 bushels per acre, reduced tillage sorghum yielded 70, and conventional tillage 45. That represents a 40 percent yield advantage for no-till sorghum over conventional tillage sorghum. What's the bottom line? Reduced tillage and no-till systems reduce soil moisture loss, which allows more moisture to be available for grain yields. Grain sorghum responds to no-till and reduced tillage systems more than wheat does.

When the results of this study were analyzed at the end in 2000, conventional-till wheat was economically more favorable when compared to no-till due to the higher cost of chemical control. However, Sorghum yields followed the the cost of glyphosate is much less
